

The City's SOCIAL LIFE

Events, Gayeties and Personal Activities of the Week

To My Love.

Light of my eye, you're a goddess in dimity,
To be near you is blessed proximity,
Though it disturbs my avowed equanimity,
Causes me many and turbulent sighs,
Claiming to me is your happy vicinity,
Tinged with a winsome and merry audacity,
Vibrant as emerald with a wondrous sagacity;
Oh! you're adorable, light of my eye!

And the felicity
Of your simplicity—
If a man miss it, he
Misses a prize.
Suits all through to you,
Honors be yours,
Toss a song to you,
Light of my eye!

Queen of my heart, you're a woman imperial,
Yet with the grace of an angel ethereal,
Dowered by nature, 'tis quite immaterial
Whether or not you're indebted to art,
Though you are coy and demure as a shepherdess,
In your deep eyes glows the glance of a leopardess,
To rouse your spirit is certainly imperative;
Yet I would dare it, O Queen of my heart!

Fatal vicinity
Of your vicinity:
When a man's in it he
Cannot depart,
Lies not untried,
Say, would you care if I'd
Made my words and music
Queen of my heart?

Love of my life, if the times were colonial,
Or if we lived as in old days Baronia,
I'd lead you captive in chains matrimonial,
For I would win you in chivalrous strife,
But, as it is, though I long for you yearningly,
I choose my time and manner sagaciously,
And if I woo you sincerely and burningly,
Say, will you smile on me, Love of my life?

Grant opportunity,
Then with impunity
I'll resume mine—
Ask you to wife,
Oh, tell me that if I
All your whims gratify
Our truth you'll ratify,
Love of my life!

—Carolyn Wells, in Puck.

Girl of the Olden Time.

"I don't know what dear ma would say," said a pretty Southern woman, in her soft vernacular, "if she could see the way girls go to parties nowadays. With us in our school it was a rite, an observance. We took time to consider our toilet and to see that everything we would need in the evening was laid out on the bed—our slippers, silk stockings, fresh petticoats of the right length, our gloves, our fans, the flowers for our hair—in fact, every accessory was well thought over and considered in the light of an essential part of a young gentleman's outfit. Then the dressing! That, too, was a serious performance, at least two hours being considered necessary to allow for the satisfactory completion of a toilet. The bath, the hair and the final minute and leisurely survey of the result, all required an ample allowance of time. But now, good gracious! My girls rush in after their gossiping afternoon tea with some of their intimates, and exclaiming that they have barely time to dress for the dinner party at which they are due, rush off, 'tub,' as they call it, do up their hair with lightning speed, put on their gowns, and are off again, before I have time to arrange the various details of their dress, so much the better. If not, they turn out the contents of their drawers, pick out what they need and making anything 'do' apparently that comes handy. Dear ma used to say that a lady could not enter a room without her fan and lace handkerchief. What would she think if she saw the careless ways of the girls of to-day? To carry a fan gracefully is a lost art, and I think the decadence of the fan may be said to mark the present epoch of careless manners and ungraceful deportment."

The Amateur Stage.

News comes to us from London that society is again turning to the amateur stage, says a writer in an Eastern paper. No house party is now correct without some attempt in this line on the part of the guests. Ten years ago no form of entertainment was so popular, and the prospect is fair for a similar demand for it. A really ambitious amateur theatrical season will be opened on the occasion of a large house party given by the Duchess of Devonshire, that notably charming hostess. Few Americans who have not been in England realize the immensity of some of these English house parties. At many of the larger country houses it is thought nothing to dine fifty guests at once and entertain a hundred is nearer the number when a neighboring party also is entertained. The fashion of never presenting one guest to another except on unusual occasions leaves the duties less arduous, though it is often hard on unsocial visitors. Usually the choice of their entertainment is left to the hostess. At these parties, although a list of attractions is made known to them of both an outdoor and indoor nature. The house party season is as inevitable in England as the sitting of Parliament, and hundreds of people start off in one direction or another with regular schedules of their intended visits, the time of arrival and departure of each being carefully indicated. Finally, their different turns, they go to their own places and do their share of the entertaining and thus keep the ball rolling, until all, sooner or later, find themselves in town.

Light of my eye, you're a goddess in dimity,
To be near you is blessed proximity,
Though it disturbs my avowed equanimity,
Causes me many and turbulent sighs,
Claiming to me is your happy vicinity,
Tinged with a winsome and merry audacity,
Vibrant as emerald with a wondrous sagacity;
Oh! you're adorable, light of my eye!
